Subject Overview:	This subject provides a cultural and political map of forms of public relations practices in a range of countries across the Asian region. The subject examines the emerging role of professional bodies and regulatory agencies in the ethical practice of public relations vis-a-vis the Asian values debate and orientalist discourses in a diverse region with multiple notions of democracy, state-corporatist regimes and global cultural flows. In exploring the activities of public relations in the production, circulation and consumption of cultural and political products, the subject looks closely at the application of culturally specific persuasive, developmental and change strategies in the management of national and global public risk campaign programmes such as HIV/AIDS. Through analyses of news, campaigns, advertisements, public service messages and folklore, the subject asks students to critically examine the work of state, trans-national, non-government, independent and global activist public relations in shaping public opinion and influencing the civic/civil sphere through hegemonic and counter-hegemonic discourses in the promotion of local-national-global ideological values and identities.
Assessment:	A written global public risk campaign analysis report of 2000 words 40% (due mid semester); a written Asian public risk related folk/modern message analysis report of 2000 words 40% (due end of semester); a 20-minute team oral presentation of an Asian advertisement 10% (commencing mid semester); and class participation 10%.
