Subject Overview:	Calls to institute human rights, truth commissions, international justice and even legalising torture are responses to injuries inflicted on peoples around the world. This subject considers law as a response to traumatic events using psychoanalytic theory. Legal practices will be discussed as methods of responding to the rage, pain and mourning that trauma demands, in this sense law becomes a symptom of the injury. Understood in this way law can be seen to also cause further damage if it functions as a kind of 'acting out' of the mourning. To consider these ideas we will look at incidents where law has been applied as a response to traumatic events in the cases of genocide, terrorist acts and war.
Objectives:	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> # to understand the effects of torture on a body and on a society; # to consider the application of law, torture and conflict resolution in relation to theories of justice; # to create an understanding of the role of human rights rhetoric in its relation to practices of punishment, prohibition and incarceration. # to develop an understanding of psychoanalytic theories of trauma; # To explore the notion of an international law and the implications of this for possibilities of plural justice.
Assessment:	A 1000-word reflective essay (20%) due during the semester, and a 4000-word research essay (80%) due during the examination period.
