Subject Overview:	Human Rights on the Screen will allow students to investigate the unique ways that visual cultures present and intervene in human rights issues of concern to local and global communities. It will also explore the relationship between human rights and animal ethics. This subject will offer students real world opportunities to become involved with Human Rights arts and film festivals and to create their own moving image projects (eg. a short film, a virtual community, a promotional campaign, a blog or website) and to curate and organise projects for not for profit organisations in response to current real world situations. This subject offers students opportunities to create visual media and research projects within a real world context. Human Rights on the Screen will be open to all students within the Cultural Management masters programs.
Learning Outcomes:	Students completing this subject will be able to: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # Understand the historical, cultural and theoretical context of human rights issues and think creatively about artistic process and how screen practices address these issues; # Develop skills of written, oral and visual communication, communicate views intelligibly and effectively; # Demonstrate a capacity for advanced research and communication skills; and # Appreciate the history of Human Rights campaigns and identify contemporary developments in moving image technologies and their potential to create change.
Assessment:	A specific case study including a class presentation, a moving image based project and a research essay totalling 5000 words 100% (due in the examination period).
