Subject Overview:	The welfare system is a central focus of social policy studies. While social policy as an area of study is usually said to embrace education, health, housing, employment and social care as well as income security, it is income security which usually occupies a central place in Master of Social Policy courses. We are currently amidst a major historical transition in the way we think about the role of social security or 'welfare'. Radical changes to the economy and the labour market in particular as well as profound changes in the pattern of family life have meant that many of the policies introduced in the period post World war two are no longer working. This subject focuses on these social and economic changes together with the current debates about the future of social welfare. The approach taken is informed by the sociology of risk developed by people like Giddens, Bauman and Beck. This work seeks to understand the changed profile of risk faced by the contemporary citizen. It relates this thinking to the work of Schmid and others on Transitional Labour Markets. This framework looks at the more specific risks people face in the key transitions across the life cycle including the early years, school to work, from work to education and or caring and back to work as well as ageing and retirement. The courses examines each in detail and also considers the possible policy responses needed to create a new social security framework to match the current risk profile.
