Subject Overview:	How is the future of sex and gender imagined in the world today? Key themes will include: the increasing instability of concepts of sex and gender and their transformations; a focus on theories of gender equity in the face of persisting gender inequality; the imagined futures of everyday gender practices, including issues around the supposed 'death of the family', work/ life balance, the low fertility 'crisis'; the future of sexualities; and the transcendence of the body, including cyborgs and cybersex. These themes will be explored in a global context.
Objectives:	 # have a sound understanding of the main developments in feminist thinking about the past and future of gender inequalities, developments around the concepts of sex and gender(s), and the intersections of gender, 'race', ethnicity and class. # an awareness of the main developments in feminist thinking about the persistence of gender inequality and the place of gender within emerging social transformations globally an understanding of feminist thinking about the emergence of radically new forms of gender, embodiment and being human, with emphasis on the interfaces between the biological and the social. # a sound understanding of the main frameworks for analysing the status, usefulness and future of the concepts of Â'sexÂ' and Â'genderÂ' in a globalising world, with a particular focus on cross-cultural comparisons of such frameworks
