Subject Overview:	Contrary to what is sometimes said and thought, corruption is, at its core, a species of moral wrongdoing or of unethical behaviour. While many examples of corrupt activity are also examples of illegal activity, it is not always the case that corrupt activities are illegal, or even that illegal activities are corrupt. This course examines the nature, causes and moral implications of corruption, as well as strategies that can be applied to combat corruption. Since the focus of the course is corruption in general, rather than corruption in any specific context, examples and cases will be drawn from a range of roles and professions, in both the public and private spheres.
Objectives:	Semester 1 Class: When successfully completed, students will have developed a good theoretical understanding of the ethical issues informing central and current understanding of Corruption and Anti-corruption, and of some key philosophical issues of importance to applied ethics more generally.
Assessment:	Two 3,000 word essays (50%) each.

Prescribed Texts:	Seumas Miller, Peter Roberts & Edward Spence. Corruption and Anti-Corruption: An Applied Philosophical Approach. Pearson Prentice Hall, 2005. Additional readings for each week will be indicated in the outline for that week.
Breadth Options:	This subject is not available as a breadth subject.

Notes:	This course is available for on-campus and off-campus (correspondence) students. On-campus students will meet with the Convener once a week to discuss readings and the conceptual materials gained by the reading materials. Distance students will participate in on-line forums for discussion of class reading materials, which students will be expected to participate in. This is the best way for off-campus students to interact with the class.
