Subject Overview:	At a time when Australian history is as contested as ever, this subject looks back at some of the key historical moments and themes that shaped late eighteenth and nineteenth century Australia. From debates over its discovery and exploration by Aborigines, Asian traders and Europeans to its penal colonies and the convict stain, it looks also at questions that persist today. Was Australia settled or invaded? Was it a new nation or an outpost of the Empire? How did women define their roles in colonial Australia as it moved towards nationhood? And who was allowed to be Australian? This subject will look also at themes of distance, land, and economic development as well as questions of political rights and national movements with the view to exploring some of the issues and tensions that continue to fuel public debate over the past. It focus on the impact of peoples, ideas and institutions on the land, on each other and on the society that would emerge by 1901. And it will touch on the structures of social organisation, political power, economic activity and everyday life. This broad subject will build a narrative of Australian colonial history and provide an introduction to the changing historiography of the major issues.
