Subject Overview:	How is foreign policy made? What factors determine which issues and problems get priority government attention? What determines success or failure in areas such as conflict prevention and resolution, institutional design and reform, and arms control and other treaty negotiations? How do new ideas, and new approaches to problem solving, gain traction with international policymakers? What strategies are most useful in building support in the UN and other intergovernmental organisations? How much influence do non-governmental organisations and other civil society actors have in international policymaking? What are the frames of reference that policymakers bring to bear, the obstacles they confront, and the strategies and techniques of diplomatic persuasion they are most likely to find effective in moving issues forward? In addressing these questions, the course will draw closely upon the experiences of Professor Evans as Australian Foreign Minister (1988-96), President and CEO of the International Crisis Group (2000-09) and chair or member of many high-level international panels, including the International Commissions on Intervention and State Sovereignty (2000-01) and Nuclear Non-Proliferation and Disarmament (2008-10). Case studies will include the Cambodian peace process, the development of Asia-Pacific economic and security architecture, the negotiation and implementation of the Chemical Weapons Convention and nuclear arms control treaties, the international response to genocide and other mass atrocity crimes, and conflict prevention and resolution in Asia, Africa, Europe and the Middle East.
Objectives:	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> # Develop a closer understanding of the way in which real-world international policymakers think and act. # Develop a specific understanding of the practical dynamics of conflict prevention and resolution, peace and security norm-building, and arms control treaty-making. # Develop the skills needed to become effective practitioners in foreign policymaking, both nationally and internationally.
Assessment:	A 3,000 word research project, in form of a briefing to government for a UN conference on appropriate response to report and recommendations of a major high-level international commission (from an approved list) due early April, worth 60%; A 1,000 word paper in form of a ministerial or cabinet submission on an international policy issue (either provided scenario, or approved specific current issue) due early May 5, worth 20%; and A 1,000 word paper in form of a (3 member team-prepared) NGO submission to government on an international policy issue (either provided scenario, or approved specific current issue) due during the examination period, worth 20%. Hurdle Requirement: Students are required to attend a minimum of 75% of classes in order to qualify to have their written work assessed.
