Subject Overview:	This subject deals with human rights issues in mainland China and other regions of East Asia such as Japan, Hong Kong and Taiwan. The impact of the pre-modern Confucian tradition will be assessed on the shaping of human rights discourse in China and East Asian contexts. An important conceptual issue is the perceived contingent nature of human rights in non-Western locations. Students will be encouraged to investigate case studies drawn from democratic and workers rights movements, cases of religious and ethnic discrimination, media censorship, and resistance to patriarchal authority. The diverse ideas put forward by Chinese and East Asian human rights theorists will be evaluated as part of an ongoing debate about the dynamic and contested nature of human rights discourse East and West.
Objectives:	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> # Have an appreciation of major human rights-related issues facing people in East Asian contexts in the contemporary era # Have an enhanced understanding of the contingent nature of human rights in non-Western contexts # Be able to apply theoretical perspectives on human rights to diverse cultures and contexts
Assessment:	A class paper 1,500 words (due 1 week after class presentation) 40%. 1 essay 2,500 words (due during the examination period) 60%.
