Subject Overview:	Crime and criminal justice can no longer be considered as local issues, whilst criminology can no longer confine itself to national borders. There are now international crimes and international courts, as well as a common conception that the crime and suffering that happens elsewhere is of global concern. This subject therefore critically examines crime, justice and responsibility from an international and comparative perspective. It explores the emergence of international crimes and international courts; analyses the operation and rationale of internationally and regionally-led interventions, which aim to both halt ongoing atrocities and reconstruct local justice systems in their wake; and, examines a series of case studies which highlight current global issues that demand criminological attention. Concerned with the connection between the local and the global, this subject seeks to highlight what criminology - traditionally a nationally focused discipline - can contribute and gain through a greater engagement with international crime and criminal justice.
Objectives:	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li># To develop a sound understanding of crime and criminal justice in a global context</li> <li># To evaluate the rationale and practice of internationalised justice initiatives</li> <li># To examine the strengths and weaknesses of current ways of addressing international crime and its societal impact</li> <li># To analyse the social, cultural and political dynamics of the internationalisation of crime and justice.</li> </ul>
Assessment:	Written work totalling 5000 words, comprising a 1500 word essay (30%) due mid-semester, and a 3500 word research essay (70%) due during the examination period.
