Subject Overview:	This subject aims to support students to undertake a legal research project, which utilises gender and/or sexuality theory and research method, on a topic of particular interest at an advanced level, under broad direction of the subject coordinator and/or a research supervisor. In the first eight weeks of semester, students will be introduced to, and invited to engage with, a diverse sample of feminist/gender and sexuality research being undertaken within the Melbourne Law School. In a series of interactive colloquia, resident and visiting researchers will present papers from their current work and discuss with students substantive, theoretical and methodological issues arising from their research and its context. Presenters or the subject coordinator will also assign additional materials for pre-reading and discussion at the seminars. Student will be expected to participate actively in the weekly seminar discussions. The topics covered in the subject seminars and the consideration of approaches to and applications of, feminist and queer legal theory and method will vary from year to year. The research undertaken for Research in Gender, Sexuality and Law (RGSL) will result in preparation of a substantial piece of legal writing. Students will be expected to submit a detailed research proposal by the end of week 8. In weeks 11 and 12 of the semester students will be required to present a brief work-in-progress outlining their research project, and to participate in providing feedback to other students in the subject. Students may also combine this subject with another optional law subject* or Advanced Legal Research (ALR) (single semester) and prepare a 10,000-word research paper as combined assessment for both subjects. The approval of both the RGSL and the optional subject coordinator or the ALR coordinator is required. Students are awarded the same mark for both subjects. The subjects may be taken in the same semester or in sequential semesters.
