Subject Overview:	Research is a vital activity of media professionals and academics. This subject offers a critical introduction to the traditions, approaches and methods used to conduct research into media institutions, technologies, texts and audiences. This subject is designed to introduce students to major approaches to media and communications research at an intermediate level. It covers approaches drawn from both humanities and social sciences, including approaches to the analysis of media texts, investigations of media institutions and political economy, and approaches to understanding and investigating media audiences, media engagement and media use. Students completing this subject will gain a deeper understanding of a range of different theoretical perspectives on media, and the way in which these are connected to different heuristic and methodological approaches to investigation and research. To this end, the subject draws on a variety of case studies and applications which students will be invited to critically consider. On completing this subject, students will have developed an understanding of different perspectives on and approaches to investigating media, as a basis upon which they can go on to design and undertake their own research projects.
Objectives:	Students completing this subject will: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # be able to understand a variety of theoretical perspectives and methodological approaches that are relevant to the study of media and communications; # be able to compare and contrast different approaches, recognising their different emphases, strengths and weaknesses; # be able to identify how different approaches can be applied to the investigation of particular problems, as a grounds for pursuing their own research.
Assessment:	Media analysis (1500 words) 40% (due mid-semester), a research essay (2500 words) 60% (due at the end of semester). This subject has a minimum hurdle requirement of 75% attendance and regular participation in tutorials. Assessment submitted late without an approved extension will be penalised at 10% per day. In-class tasks missed without approval will not be marked. All pieces of written work must be submitted to pass this subject.
