Subject Overview:	This subject considers the mutually enforcing role of socio-cultural theory and ethnography in understandings of the contemporary human endeavour. Through an introduction to key social theorists and critical readings from selected core monographs and articles, the subject explores how socio-cultural theory both shapes and is shaped by ethnographic research. Particular emphasis is placed on both classic and modern theories of personhood, social identity and relatedness in social anthropology and their relevance for understanding a range of contemporary social issues relating to kinship, migration, tourism, nationalism, modernity, ageing and life course, new genetics and web technologies. On completion students taking this course should have gained an appreciation of anthropological approaches to the study of the person and their relevance to a range of political, ethical, economic and cultural concerns about fetal rights, corporations, child soldiers and global internet usage, as examples, in societies across the world today.
Objectives:	Students who successfully complete this subject will: <ul style="list-style-type: none"># Develop a critical awareness of the contemporary relevance and application of both classic and modern theories in social anthropology;# Appreciate how a comparative perspective and a tradition of empirical enquiry can inform developments in theory;# Engage with theories located in specific times and places and apply them to a range of ethnographic case studies located in national and transnational social spaces;# Gain an appreciation of the links that exist between anthropological approaches to the study of the person and their relevance to a range of political, ethical, economic and cultural concerns in the world today.

Assessment:	Two research essays of 2000 words (50% each), one due mid-semester and the other due during the examination period.
