Subject Overview:	This subject focuses on the idea that since the 1970s there has been a rise in punitiveness right across the developed nations of the west. The subject asks students to identify and understand the different domains in which punitiveness might reside and have notionally been increased. It will introduce students to key debates within contemporary criminology concerning the extent, substance and reasons for changes in punitiveness. The subject will explore through a series of case studies the experiences of nations that have seen apparent rises in punitiveness as well as countervailing cases, such as in the Scandanavian countries and Canada, which seem to have escaped the trend. On completion of the subject students should have an understanding of both the data and explanatory and theoretical arguments concerning what has been seen as a major defining feature of most western nations' recent history: the inexorable rise of punitive attitudes and practices.
Learning Outcomes:	On completion of this subject students should: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li># understand the various ways in which punishment, or punitiveness more broadly, has changed in western nations since the 1970s;</li> <li># be able to identify punitive and non-punitive states;</li> <li># be capable to explain the main arguments relating to punitive intent across a range of 'justice' sectors, from the courts to prisons and new penal domains, such as anti-terrorist initiatives.</li> </ul>
Assessment:	A Policy brief of 2000 words (40%) due mid-semester, and an Essay of 3000 words (60%) due in the Semester 2 examination period.
