Subject Overview:	This intensive four-week study abroad subject will be taught in Venice between the end of November and December 2015 and focuses on the use, circulation and reception of languages and texts in early modern Venice. Texts include manuscripts, pamphlets, incunabula, inscriptions, architectural spaces and paintings. Some aspects of palaeography (the art of analysing and reading handwriting) will be studied. Field trips to the Marciana Library and the Museo Correr will provide students with basic knowledge of codicology (study of manuscripts) and the basic skills needed to work on fifteenth century primary sources. On completion of this subject, students should have acquired an understanding of the use of languages and paces in early modern Venice (and Italy). Students will also be able to gain a basic knowledge of the language and text production of the Italian Renaissance.
Learning Outcomes:	Students who complete this subject will: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # interpret and analyse a range of texts and cultural materials within their historical context # communicate effectively in a variety of formats, in order to appreciate Italy's cultural and historical development of Italy # gain an understanding of the development of Italian vernaculars before and during the Renaissance # acquire relevant analytical and research skills, including those needed to carry out research in Italian libraries # appreciate Italian culture and history by studying a range of critical texts and cultural materials
