Subject Overview:	Questions of credibility and trust are integral to the assessment of knowledge claims both within science and in the context of public debate. Questions about trust and credibility consequently arise every day in a range of professional contexts, for example in journalism and public relations, in police work, in development work, in scientific research, etc. But what is trust and what makes one trustworthy? And how do we pick out who the experts are? This course will interest students in a wide range of careers, exploring these topics together with students of applied ethics. Questions to be covered: Trust <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # What is trust? What makes one trustworthy? # Is there a decline in trust, in the media, in politicians, or in scientists for example? # Do we need to trust our sources of information, and do they need to trust us? # How do we manage conflicts that arise in relationships of trust? Credibility <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # What indicators do people rely on when trusting others, or information in the media? # What makes someone a credible source of information? # Do we need additional verification, and if so how much? Expertise <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # Should we defer to experts?

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> # What role do 'experts' play in public debate # What if even the experts disagree? # How do we pick out who the experts are? # Can lay people contribute expertise?
Learning Outcomes:	Students who successfully complete this subject will: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # develop an understanding of recent approaches to trust, credibility, and expertise in the social sciences and humanities. # be able to apply these approaches to problems involving one or more of the three topics that arise in their area of professional specialisation.
