Subject Overview:	Developed from at least the fifth century BCE onwards, the metalanguage of rhetoric (writing on writing, or discourse on discourse) is today inextricably imbricated in both practices and critiques of media language. This subject examines the highly controversial history of rhetoric, always already embedded in philosophy, as well as its competing definitions, and various appearances, influences, and even metamorphoses, in writing practices and in theories of communication from the time of Aristotle through to the age of electronic media. At the same time, the subject addresses current practices of media writing within national and global media spheres. It views these through the lens of the metalanguage of rhetoric, encouraging critical engagement with both media writing and rhetorical theory, and most importantly with students' own writing practices.
Learning Outcomes:	Students who complete this subject will: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> # be able to recognise and explain how the metalanguage of rhetoric applies to 21 st century media writing; # be able to demonstrate knowledge of the history of rhetoric and principles of philosophical rhetoric; and # be able to utilise their theoretical knowledge of rhetoric to reflect on their own media writing practices.
Assessment:	A seminar paper of 1500 words worth 20% (due during the semester); an original piece of appropriately-targeted media writing 1000 words worth 20% (due during the semester); a critical, theoretical essay of 2500 words worth 60% (due in the examination period).
